Not illustrated. 1915 Excerpt: .for hardy peaches and apples and in comparing the results of spring and fall planting of apple trees. Fourteen different materials were used in spraying apple trees, and in this work soluble sulphur was found to cause injury to the foliage and fruit of apples. An elaborate study was made of the frost injuries to plant tissue. It was definitely determined that the killing temperature of plant tissue, which is destroyed at a relatively high temperature, may be reduced whenever the sap density of the tissue is increased. Slow wilting or partial withholding of water through a long period appeared to increase the resistance of tissue to low temperature. The killing temperature for peach blossoms when the tree is just coming into full bloom appeared to vary from 22 F. to 26 F. After the flowers had become pollinated, and from that time until the peaches were one-half inch in diameter, the fruit tissues continued to become more susceptible to frost. Further studies were made on the soluble materials in sap and the osmotic pressure of sap as related to the susceptibility of trees to frost. A study of bud selection of strawberries showed that it was not possible to increase the yield by propagating plants from buds of the-most productive varieties. In the use of fertilizers in peach orchards, nitrogen was the only element to which the trees responded satisfactorily. The entomological department devoted much time to the enforcement of nursery and orchard inspection. Work...
