Not illustrated. 1876 Excerpt: . . . which could be spared by the inhabitants were placed in the front of the chiefs hut, but little and not substantial at all for hungry stomachs; and the assurance of the chief, that in any of the settlements, before reaching Roraima, we would find as little as we found with him, dejected us more than the disappointed hope of an abundant meal to-day. In consequence of the family war to which our attention had been called at Torong-Yauwise, a good many Arekunas had gone towards the west; the provision fields had been destroyed by the victorious party, and left uncultivated. Game was neither seen in the valley nor on the mountains, and the small-sized fish in the rivers, not longer than a finger, belonging to the genus H yposioma, would need to have been caught by thousands to satisfy such half starved men. Vegetables were the only things we could depend on. After the sad news our stay could only be of short duration, and after accepting the offer of two young men to accompany us to the Roraima (although adding two more hungry individuals to our company), we left the settlement Yawangra sadder than we entered it. As we left, two old women took eoiuage to bring us three small cakes of cassava bread, some roasted maize, and several calabashes with Kasiri; the latter we gave up to our Indians with the greatest of pleasure. The two old crones were rewarded with beads and a...
